and old papers would greatly better existing conditions for American manufacturers.

Something like 15,000 tons of different kinds of paper and paper board are manufactured every day in the United States and a large portion of this, after it has served its purpose, could be used over again in some class of paper. A large part of it, however, is either burned or otherwise wasted. This, of course, has to be replaced by new materials. In the early history of the paper industry publicity was given to the importance of saving rags. It is of scarcely less importance now. The Department of Commerce is glad to bring this matter to the attention of the public in order that practical results may be flow from it. A little attention to the saving of rags and old papers will mean a genuine relief to our paper industry and a diminishing drain upon our sources of supply for new materials.

A list of dealers in paper stocks can be obtained from the local Chamber of Commerce or Board of Trade.

THE L. A. GALLUP CO.

PERISHABLE GLORY

"Yes, it does look a little bare, I admit," said the mistress of the parlor when her sister dropped in and found her rearranging her living room.
But like it better than you know.
Laird's things were handsome and they looked pretty here, but I'm thankful to have them gone. They were a curse, and besides I don't like to see such false colors.

"Thank you, dear," she continued.
"Too handsome the truth is, I haven't always been quite straightforward about Mrs. Laird's furniture. That is, because I ask you whether you brought her friend, Mrs. Tremaine, here to call.

"Of course, the minute Alice entered the room the first words she said were 'Thank you, dear,' and she exclaimed over it."

"Why, Eleanor," she asked, "when did you get that perfectly wonderful Bokhara? And look at all your new mahogany, too! That desk is perfectly charming. I didn't know you had been buying such a lot of new furniture."

"I haven't, Alice," I replied. "All these handsome new things I bought from Mrs. Laird, who has just moved out of the apartment above, and I'm simply keeping them for her until she simply thinks them again."

"I noticed during the rest of the call that our usually very capable Alice was a little distrustful."

"That evening she telephoned me.
'I'm utilizing the privilege of my old and intimate friend, Eleanor,' she said, 'to tell you that I think it wonderfully almost crude, in fact, to let a stranger like Mrs. Vickars come in and see that gorgeous rug and the beautiful mahogany were not yours. You needn't ask me whether I am enamored of it. What's the use of being so unnecessarily frank always? Instead of putting me to the test, you should always seem to me that you positively never miss a chance to discredit yourself.'

"Nonsense," I laughed, but I told John what Alice had said and he insisted that there was some justice in her rebuke.

"You know, my dear Eleanor," he remarked, "that if any one admires a mahogany you are wearing you never fall to say—rather gratuitously, I think—that you made it yourself and found the goods on the bargain counter."

"After these criticisms from my husband and from my best friend I firmly decided to do the things in my living room very next afternoon Mrs. Vickars came in to see. She noticed the rug at once and congratulated me on having such a perfect example of my wisest investment in the rug. It developed that she is an expert on rugs, and before she had half finished her remarks I was on my floor. I was feeling too guilty for words. But I braced myself with the thought that I was keeping up the stupid make-believe of Mrs. Laird and Alice, and I said nothing about the rug's real ownership.

"I'm determined to find that you are turning your attention to articles of rare beauty," Mrs. Vickars gushed on.
"for I have noticed that you are becoming more and more interested in what you see. And seeing you have so many new and beautiful things in your delightful apartment gives me pleasure to ask you to buy some more unusual lace." She took a package from her large handbag and opened it and displayed several pieces of lace.
"Point," I'm selling this for the benefit of Belgian orphan girls in Holland, and I feel sure you'll be glad to buy a piece."

"Of course I hadn't the reckless abandon then to deny the ownership of the handsome lace. I sent me room, and I don't like to tell you, sister dear, the price of that lace for I feel that you are wearing my wisest crazy for having bought three yards.
I told Mrs. Vickars that I was glad indeed to have the Belgians in New York, but I could, which was true, tell my husband would send her a check."

"Yes, the joke was on John undoubtedly. He grumbled some, but I told him that if we should ever have a daughter and she should marry he would be proud to see her wearing that lace on her wedding frock."

"No, it didn't console him so much as you would think. However, he wrote the check for the lace and I began to feel that my borrowed grand-daddy wasn't such a bad thing after all, for I had not realized how much more picturesque myself owning a length of such exquisite lace. I know you will be wild over it. I can assure me, much longer than were going to store Mrs. Laird's furniture and I replied alright that I hadn't the least idea.

"I can assure you that what was going to take place.

"Yesterday the Baker girls called, and they, too, exclaimed over the beauty of the Bokhara, and were enchanted with the new mahogany pieces."

"What attractive things you are getting," said Elizabeth. "This rug is perfectly stunning."

"Yes," I replied with becoming modesty. "I like it very well. It's said to be a perfect example of the best Bokhara period." Just then the doorbell rang and I excused myself to answer it."

"Say," shouted the husky youth on the steps. "Mrs. Laird, she sent me round here with my wagon for three things of hers. Here's a list she wrote in a rug, a desk, a table and a chair-in."

"Correct," I answered weakly, and I led him into the living room, from which he carried off the Laird belongings before the astonished eyes of my guests!"—Exchanged.
